and motivated rural women to explore income-generating activities such as pickle making, jam and jelly preparation, papad, chutneys and other daily-use household products, which can be produced locally with minimal investment. She highlighted that such ventures not only utilize traditional skills already present among women but can also be scaled up into sustainable micro-enterprises through collective effort under self-help groups. Ritika Trehan strongly advocated the role of Self-Help Groups as powerful instruments of social and economic transformation. She explained how SHGs help women pool resources, share skills, access credit facilities and collectively market their products. Citing successful examples, she convinced women that with proper training, branding and market linkage, small household initiatives can turn into reliable sources of income, thereby strengthening family finances and enhancing women's decision-making role within households and society.

The awareness programme concluded with an interactive session, during which women raised queries related to training, funding, market access and government support. Ritika Trehan patiently addressed their concerns and assured continued handholding and follow-up support.
